Next-Generation Melvyl Timeline

Pilot began in May 2008 and lasted through Dec 2008

During the pilot, staff conducted formal usability testing gathering input from UC students, faculty, staff, and other users to determine how well the system meets their needs

In fall 2009, a more fully developed Request system will be in place—fewer clicks for users to get to the item

Following the completion of the pilot, a decision was made to move forward with OCLC's WorldCat Local

Does the Pilot include all of Melvyl?

No. For the purpose of testing, the Pilot does not include all records currently found in Melvyl

Many campus affiliated libraries, the California State Library, the Law Libraries, and non-UC libraries in existing Melvyl are not included in the initial Pilot

In order to search our complete holdings, check the existing Melvyl Catalog, http://melvyl.cdlib.org

Is existing Melvyl going away now?

No, UC Libraries must assess the effectiveness of the Pilot before making this decision

Existing Melvyl will not be removed until a robust and fully complete system is available to replace it

Why should you try it?

This pilot is substantially different from the existing Melvyl Catalog

User feedback is essential to help us determine whether it meets the needs of UC students, faculty, and staff, and to understand how we can improve it on every New Guinean's mind—the rapid pace of political developments. Papua New Guinea, as Yali's nation is now called, was at that time still administered by Australia as a mandate of the United Nations, but independence was in the air. Yali explained to me his role in getting local people to prepare for self-government.

Anybody can try out the pilot!

After a while, Yali turned the conversation and began to quiz me. He had never been outside New Guinea and had not been educated beyond high school, but his curiosity was insatiable. First, he wanted to know about my work on New Guinea birds (including how much I got paid for it). I explained to him how different groups of birds had colonized New Guinea over the course of millions of years. He then asked how the ancestors of his own people had reached New Guinea over the last tens of thousands of years, and how white Europeans had colonized New Guinea within the last 200 years.

The conversation remained friendly, even though the tension between the two societies that Yali and I represented was familiar to both of us. Two centuries ago, all New Guineans were still "living in the Stone Age." That is, they still used stone tools similar to those superseded in Europe by metal tools thousands of years ago, and they dwelt in villages not organized under any centralized political authority. Whites had arrived, imposed centralized government, and brought material goods whose value New Guineans instantly recognized, ranging from steel axes, matches, and medicines to clothing, soft drinks, and umbrellas. In New Guinea all these goods were referred to collectively as "cargo."

Many of the white colonialists openly despised New Guineans as "primitive." Even the least able of New Guinea's white "masters," as they were still called in 1972, enjoyed a far higher standard of living than New Guineans, higher even than charismatic politicians like Yali. Yet Yali had quizzed lots of whites as he was then quizzing me, and I had quizzed lots of New Guineans. He and I both knew perfectly well that New Guineans are on the average at least as smart as Europeans. All those things must have been on Yali's mind when, with yet another penetrating glance of his flashing eyes, he asked me, "Why is it that you white people developed so much cargo and brought it to New Guinea, but we black people had little cargo of our own?"

It was a simple question that went to the heart of life as Yali experienced it. Yes, there still is a huge difference between the lifestyle of the average
